Saturday, 23 April 2010 The last element to be successfully validated is the AchievementTest. There are three text fields related to the type of achievement (TextFieldTest) (note: There is also a CheckBox that should be checked when a user has unlocked a certain achievement). A rather simple test since only one textfield is valid while the other two are not valid. To start out with a clean slate and avoid mistakes, we must ensure that the right attribute is being set for each text field. After constructing and validating our test, the only thing left to do is to add content to it. Of course, this is also dependent upon the industry that we are working on and the toolkit that we have selected, but there are a few things that should be considered when setting the content. In the first place, I needed to ensure that the first textfield has the minimum length of 10 characters (regardless of the value of the maxlength attribute). Once that was out of the way, I set the text field's content to 10. Once the test has been constructed and updated to validate, we must create a new achievement for the user and, in order to do that, we must add a new text field to the test case, titled "Achievement test". Once the new text field has been created, the user can add the desired achievement. This being said, what has been illustrated here is an example of how an application can be created, utilizing this method in order to validate the data that a user enters. In the next post, I will introduce a scenario in which data fields need to be validated with the intention to enter only one value per field. Friday, 8 April 2010 Let's assume that we want to "create a review system" for an application of ours. The idea of the review is to allow the users to be able to download the product and after that, rate it. In this post, we will be looking into validating the fields that have to be used. In the first place, we will start out by building a review for a company. As a simple starting point, we will start by constructing a test case that will contain 5 fields, each of which has a minimum value of 10 characters. This simple amount of data should
