And now, on to the news: A collection of 10,000 unidentified radio transmissions gathered from all across the world will be studied. A researcher has started to catalogue the unintelligible noise. The set of recordings has been kept under wraps. Each document is identical to the rest, saving on the future if any bug were to lead to mistakes. The collection was placed in a safe way, locked into a blind-key cabinet. All the files are stored on separate drives; no one knows where. The project, commissioned by the British Library, is being supervised by Amelia Jackson. So, when the data has been fully analysed, the British Library will give an opportunity for anyone to get more information on the noise by discussing the findings and uploading the recordings to the Internet. Jackson is committed to giving the data to the public. A person in charge of making sure that she follows the relevant rules of confidentiality will release the information, once the research has been complete. The researcher has already started working and has 2,000 documents entered into the database. “The data is a little disorienting” Jackson told the researchers. “There are no markings or notes, so you are given a blank slate to start from.” It has been reported that the first sound the researcher heard when she started, was a roar of a voice that said “Go”. Jackson’s project is one of the largest data collection projects in history. It is estimated that the noise has been stored for the last 70 years. “This is a very exciting project” The British Library’s Head of Historic Manuscripts, Andrea Moore said. “As all listeners hope to hear a day or two before the end, someone will hear what this person heard. It is fascinating to be able to compare our response to what is clearly the sound of another age.” If you don’t have the time to transcribe the recordings, you can get a computer program that will read them for you. The library has allowed this, because it wants to make sure that someone who is interested in the project can access it. If not, you can always just listen to the recordings and see what they say. For now, the data is available to everyone to put into a database. 570a42141b
