I have supplied them with various parts for building stock, then they must order these as needed so we can both meet demand. They frequently ask me to build stock and I've delivered stuff, either finished or not. I'm not sure if they are employees or contractors of mine. In the first place they manage their own stock, I'm only involved if the customer asks for stuff I have not delivered. I know contractors/sub-contractors like this are mainly likely to be self-employed. I have not looked into the local law to find out if this changes in the UK. A: You are an agent of your customer. In contract law, an agent is someone that others hire to act on their behalf. You are the agent because you are doing the things your customer tells you to do. The job you are doing is not your own. You are not an employee of your customer, you are a sub-agent for your customer. This explains: A:
